Excerpt: .now; therefore were there no other reasons for beginning the work carefully and proceeding slowly, these would be sufficient. But there are others of an important nature. It will be found that, out of the eight oarsmen of a crew, one or two will not have been accustomed to rise regularly at seven o'clock even in summer, and that more than one or two of those who have been so accustomed, have not been in the habit of taking anything deserving of the name of exercise. Page 4. por an these reasons, the morning exercise should be, in its initiatory stages, very light and gentle indeed; I would place it in duration within an hour, including the time occupied in going to and from the training-ground. For the first week let two miles be walked at the rate of three and a half to four miles an hour, beginning the walk at the former rate and, towards the end of the week, breaking into the latter; and ever after throughout the training course sustaining the walking at this latter rate. The second week should see an augmentation of the work. Men will now to some extent have become accustomed to the methodical rising in the morning, to the open air, and to the regular exercise. On these grounds this exercise may now be increased in its two aspects of duration and speed. The men should now be on the ground by half past...
