Excerpt: . received from many of those who had been witnesses of my conduct, as far as they had opportunities of judging of it, were highly gratifying. The Court is already in possession of the letters of the gallant Rear Admiral who was my second in command, than the language of which nothing can be more strong and decisive. I had received from the Admiralty their approbation of my conduct in the action. I had, by the last appointment, received from the Commander in Chief, under whose orders I had acted, the most solid and substantial proof of his satisfaction of the manner in which those orders were executed; and I had flattered myself, that upon my return, I should have been again honoured with the approbation of my Sovereign, and that my brave associates in the fight would have received those rewards which are the usual attendants of victories, such as that which we had achieved--this they at least merited, whatever might have been my subsequent conduct. The Court will judge what a disappointment it must have been to those expectations, and what must have been the sensations I felt, on the arrival of ships from England, to find myself traduced and vilified in all the newspapers.--Even the most moderate of them accused me of playing with the feelings of the public, and disappointing those expectations which I had myself contributed to raise. I felt myself not a little hurt by the consideration, that the...
